cross. On the other creekbank the path ascends a few steps to continue downstream. Sixty metres on is a false track straight ahead while the real track zigzags up on your left. At this point on your left there could be a small waterfall after heavy rain.

After passing a shelter site under a rock overhang the track descends to the creek again. To cross the creek a bit of 'rock hopping' is called for! Look for carved steps on a rock in the creek and recently painted white arrows. The track on the other side is slightly downstream of where you met the creek.

Another fifty metres brings you below Echo Point. There used to be a shelter shed here. Four stone steps and an almost flat area between the track and the creek are all that remain. Below is the junction of Dantes Glen and Frederica Falls Creeks. At the bottom of the 4 steps an old track is obscured by small trees growing on the fifth step! It zigzags down more steps to a pool in Frederica Falls Creek.

Now your path heads upstream to Frederica Falls. At one spot the track is actually in part of the creek and stepping stones take you over the water.

Eighty metres past this is the location of the western end of the old Lucys Glen loop track. Only experienced bushwalkers should attempt this track. After following the base of the rocks six stone steps lead down to the creek. On the other side the track ascends more steps heading upstream. Fallen trees and a washed-out piece of track make progress difficult. Deviate uphill around the missing bit. 25 metres beyond this the track disappears — you need to cross the creek here to pick up the last 10 metres of
